Over 400 years ago groups of people from England landed on the East coast of North America and established settlements there. Some went there for economic gain, some to escape religious persecution. Family farms were established and small industries developed around fishing, timber and crafts. They also traded with the Native American tribes for animal furs. Merchants set up tobacco and sugar plantations and exported their produce to Europe.

Around the 1600s people from different parts of Europe settled on the East coast, establishing communities built around shared views on moral order and religious freedom. The settlers realised that they had to pay taxes to their British rulers in London but had no say in government affairs, especially taxation and import duties. This caused unrest amongst them. In one well-known incident, tea shipments belonging to the East India Company were blocked at the harbour in Boston and the tea crates were thrown overboard.

Eventually this led to the War of Independence, fought between the settlers in the American colonies and the British forces. The British were defeated in this war and the settlers became independent. The colonies were united and a new nation – the United States of America – was born.
